The Warring States period (475-221 B.C.) is considered the epoch of the maximum flourishing of early Chinese “rhetoric”, which find its expression in particular through the two main polemical techniques of argumentation (biàn 辯) and persuasion (shuì 說). This presentation will aim at a coherent overview of argumentation and persuasion based on selected cases preserved in pre-imperial and early imperial literature of China.